

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

I have been blessed with tremendous support without which this book would never have been possible. I would like to thank my family, especially my mother, Brigid, and my father, Noel, whose example has taught me much about faith and work, and whose financial, emotional, and spiritual support has bolstered my academic studies. I thank my mentors from Marquette University, Dr. Michael Duffey, Dr. Patrick Carey, Fr. Richard Roach, and Fr. Phillip Rossi, who have given support and guidance throughout my graduate studies from which the ideas of this book originated. I thank Marquette's College of Business Administration whose cooperative spirit made the process of establishing links between theology and management a positive and fruitful experience. Most especially I would like to thank Dr. Thomas Bausch, Dean of the Business School, who treated me not as a student but as a colleague.

I thank Dr. Thomas R. Martin, Mr. John P. Sommers, Mr. James H. DeWees, Dr. Thomas Bausch, Mr. John Murray and anonymous whose generous financial support through a fellowship/lectureship in Marquette's University College of Business Administration enabled me to finish my dissertation and enable me to spend more time on revising it into a book. I especially thank Mr. John Murray who has conveyed to me the profound vision of management as profession and vocation.

I owe a tremendous amount of thanks to Dr. Gene Laczniak, the chair of the marketing department in Marquette's Business School, who has provided innumerable suggestions and hundreds of hours of time. His friendship and scholarly guidance have given me an appreciation for the demands and pressures associated with organizations.

I thank the Society of the Divine Savior (Salvatorians) North American Province, whose archives supplied the pictures of Leo XIII, Pius XI, Pius XII, and John XXXII. And I thank my brother Thomas for the picture of John Paul II.

A special thanks goes to the University of St. Thomas Office Automation Services, especially to Ms. Nancy Straus, Mr. Kim Gubrud and Ms. Linda Halverson, who prepared this text for publication.
